and he assumed that he had been nominated by the convention because of his practical utility in this sphere. If elected to Congress his abilities would be directed to the promotion of Virginia's material interests. The North had grown wealthy because she had directed her efforts toward, and used her national patronage for, the furtherance of her material interests, and it is now time for the South to pursue the same policy. He had been more particularly identified with the railroad interests, and what legislative experience he had had was in the Virginia Legislature wars ago, when it had chartered and fostered those great railroad lines which are now the channels for her commerce, and he balieved the sinews of her material prosperity. So far as the war was concerned, he could not claim to have come out of it as a military hero. He was not even a colonel, but was still a plain Mister; but he did claim that he had passed through it is perfect sympathy with his people, and had done all in his special sphere to further Southern interests. This was all he deemed it necessary for hima mere business man-to say in regard to his position in this canvass. He did not see that he was called on to discuss questions of State policy not legitimately involved in this canvass. They were for the State Legis'ature, not for the national couscils. He would assure the people, as a business man, he keew that capital, which we need in the State, was expeedingly sensitive as to questions of the sort now agitated in the State, and their simple agitation was sufficient to keep it away from us. As to the readjusters, if their principles involve any issues in national lead them into the ranks of that party which we have been fighting ever since the war. 10,000 If the readjusters desired the success of the second secon then put forth a third ticket? Is the demo oratio party, founded by Madison, Jefferson, 1,800 and Jackson, to be superseded by a local organization, the principles of which could not live an hour if taken beyond the limits of Virginia? If we Virginians have, since the war, gained control of our State government, and secured the rights of person and property, and saved ourselves from spoliation, we owe it to the dem ceratic party-shall we now destroy that party and substitute for it another of whose purposes outside of Virginia, nothing is known? Alluding to our candidate for President, Mr. B. said he was a man who fairly challenged our support. The North could not object to himnor could she denounce the South as disloyal for supporting him. His untorances in his memorable orders in Louisiana, and since, were peculiarly in accord with the Southern deas of constitutional right. The South oacnot afford to turn berself over to the republican party, whose inspiration is based upon bos: lity to her. If prosperity comes to the South it must be through the other party. Garfield is a type of his party-he speaks with a double tongue-preaches pacification to the country, and then flaunts the bloody shirt. The Bouth is as true to the Union and the Constitu. tion as any other people, and we demand that the party administering the government shall recognize the fact. He was not bere as a political athlete, but if elected, he would not go to Congress as a mero figure-head or partizio. Personally, his highest ambition was to serve his people in the advancement of their material interests; and as a representative in the Congress of the United States he would endeavor to protect the rights of all, and whenever, in legislation before Congress, he could forward the interests of Virginia, they might rest assured that his best energies would be brought to bear in that direction. If, however, the people of this district, thought he was not equal to the task, or that another could serve them better or more efficiently, he was ready to step aside and let them vote for him In answer to the charge that he was ineligible to a seat in Congress, because of his temporary residence in Washington city, he said that he was a Virginian as all his fathers were. That if he was not a Virginian he would be glad if somebody would tell him what he was. He was registered and paid his capitation tax in Virginar—his earthly possessions were chiefly in Virginia real estate, and there was not a day, unless off on business, that his feet did not press the soil of Virginia. The constitution requires that members of Congress shall reside in their districts at the time of election, and to place the matter beyond cavil, he had "broke up house. keeping in Washington, removed to Alexandria and was now regularly domiciled in the land of his birth.
